Excerpt: . . . day, as she crouched, fascinated with terror, among the pillows, she was quite prepared to see him enter--avenger of blood--with the ministers of justice at his heels. She had all the popular dread of the law, and much more than the popular ignorance of its powers. For months past, moreover, she had been cultivating professionally a naturally picturesque and powerful imagination; and her nerves had scarcely recovered a shock severe enough to have tried less artistically sensitive ones than hers. So it happened that when, at last, towards nightfall, George did come in, she shut her eyes and covered beneath the coverings, awaiting doom. He only made a few cold inquiries after her health and her requirements. Annes courage revived at this; she looked up, and answered meekly and almost deprecatingly. Then he stood a few minutes in an awkward silence. At last he..
